(4) If an inventor is a raid that someone will steal his illea before he can put it in shape he can protect himself in two ways. First, he can make out a paper called a "Cavest" and send to the commissioner of potents. This document briefit describes his invention, and declares that he has not you perfected it. It will be good for a year, if no one class has gotten bload of hire: and it may be renewed for another vest. The cavent is lescribe! on pages 52 and 50 of "Rules of Tractice," and a specimen caveat is given further alone in that publication. A fee of ten dellars must be paid to Uncle Sam for each year a caveat is in force. Another way to guard one's rights is to tell a trusty friend about the exact nature of the proposed invention, and have that friend make a record of the date, so that, if necessary, he can swear to it, and thus prove priority of invention, if some one else wrongfully claims the credit. This plan is as good as any other.
